Quetzalcoatl: The Feathered Serpent God

In the realm of Aztec deities, Quetzalcoatl stands as a revered figure. Known as the feathered serpent god, he ascended from the heavens to bestow upon humanity the precious gift of knowledge and civilization.

The Origin of Corn

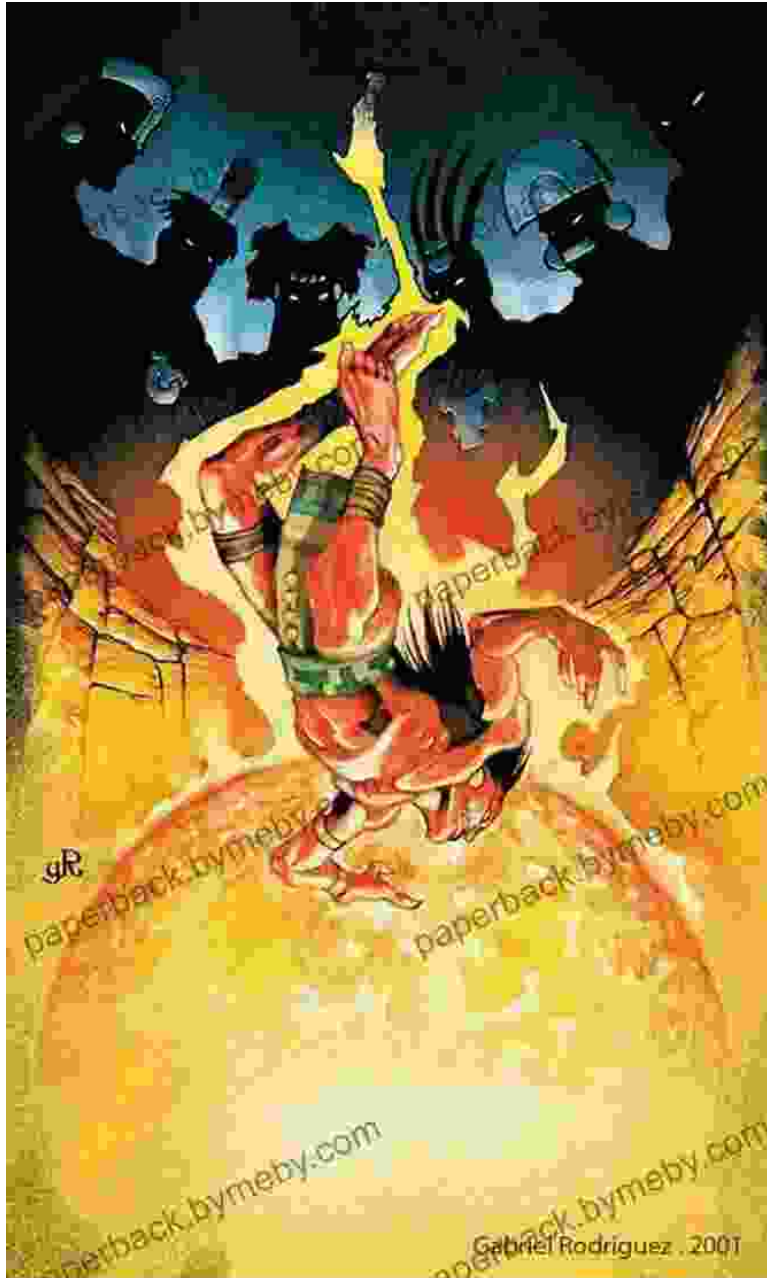

Legend has it that the Aztecs were once a simple people, subsisting on roots and insects. Their lives took a transformative turn when Quetzalcoatl descended from the heavens, carrying with him a precious gift - the corn plant.

Corn, known as "maíz" in Nahuatl, became the cornerstone of Aztec society. It sustained their communities, providing nourishment, sustenance, and cultural significance.

The Sacrifice of Nanahuatzin

The legend of Quetzalcoatl and the corn plant is interwoven with the poignant tale of Nanahuatzin. This humble hunchback god willingly sacrificed himself by leaping into a blazing fire.

From the ashes of Nanahuatzin's sacrifice emerged the sun, illuminating the world with its warmth and light. This act of selflessness ensured the survival and prosperity of humanity.

The Corn Plant: A Gift from the Gods

As a reward for Nanahuatzin's sacrifice, Quetzalcoatl planted the first corn plant in the fertile soil. This life-giving crop flourished, providing the Aztecs with sustenance and becoming an integral part of their rituals and beliefs.

The corn plant represented more than just nourishment; it embodied the divine connection between the Aztecs and their gods. It was revered as a symbol of fertility, growth, and the eternal cycle of life.
