The three sillies were about to give up when they saw a talking frog. The frog told them that he could help them cross the river if they would give him a ride on their raft. The three sillies agreed, and the frog helped them to cross the river.

The three sillies continued on their journey, and they soon came to a forest. They decided to camp in the forest, but Lazybones was too lazy to gather firewood, Simpleton was too stupid to know how to build a fire, and Lunkhead was too clumsy to keep the fire going.

The three sillies were about to freeze to death when they saw a mischievous monkey. The monkey told them that he could help them to start a fire if they would give him some of their food. The three sillies agreed, and the monkey helped them to start a fire.

The three sillies continued on their journey, and they soon came to a mountain. They decided to climb the mountain, but Lazybones was too lazy to climb, Simpleton was too stupid to know how to climb, and Lunkhead was too clumsy to climb.

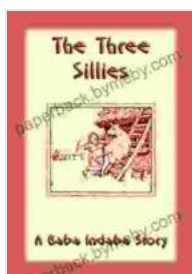

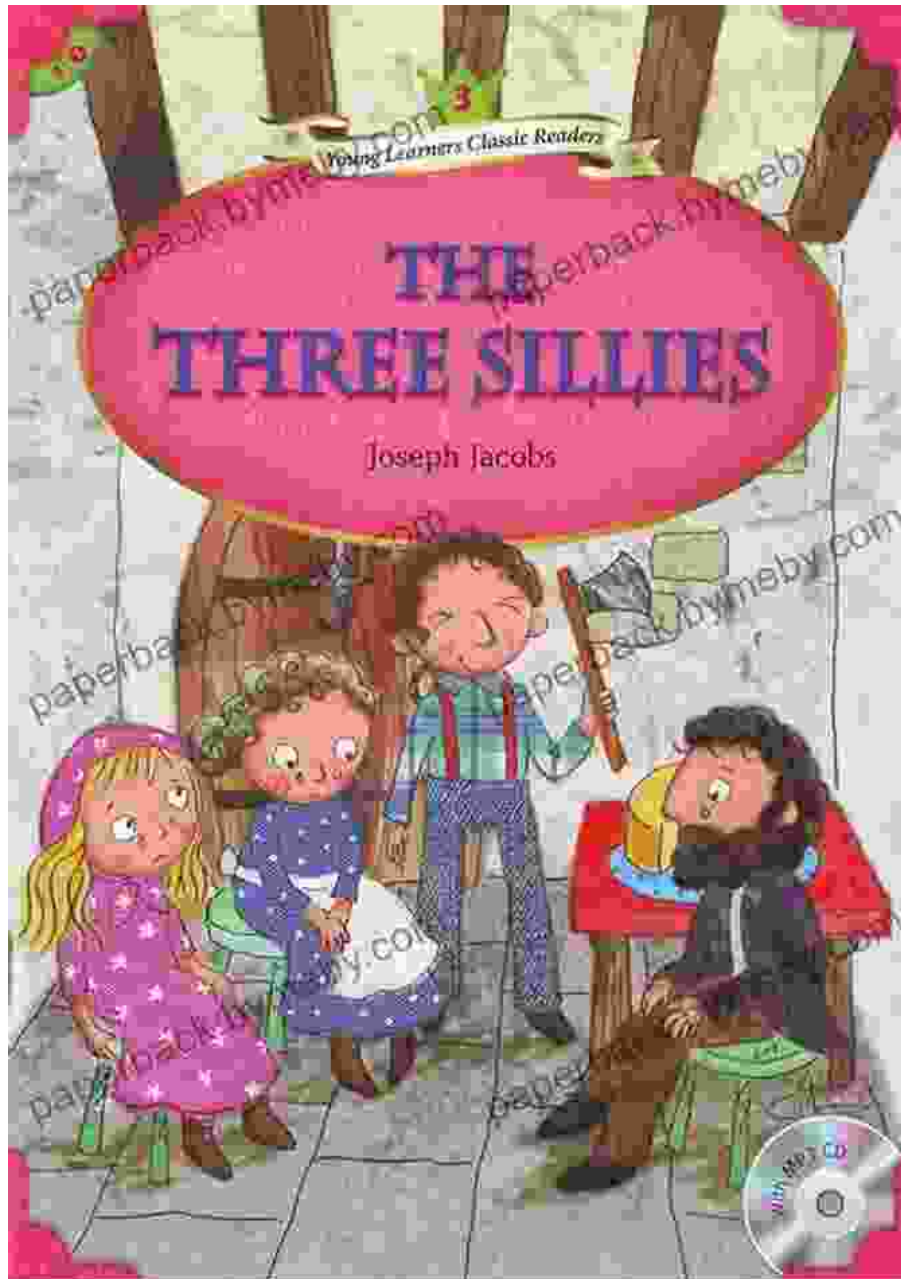

The three sillies were about to give up when they saw a wise old tortoise. The tortoise told them that he could help them to climb the mountain if they would help him to carry his shell. The three sillies agreed, and the tortoise helped them to climb the mountain.

The three sillies finally reached the top of the mountain, and they were overjoyed. They had found a cure for their ailments. Lazybones had learned to be more industrious, Simpleton had learned to be more intelligent, and Lunkhead had learned to be more coordinated.

The three sillies returned to their village, and they lived happily ever after.
